THE BARBARIAN . . . by Robert M. Hyatt a tale of Sybaris and Macedon in the year 507.

"O friend, Lorens will order their to be thrown to the orpollument in the death for preseribes for spins of Pythogorus. But fear out, one less hope, Kalvali has a plan I have not the keys of the cells, but tomight Kalvali will undestake to release thee Listen!" Melos rupped a hand to one ear. "To the guard! I result go! Be of pood cheer, friend!"

Melou was pone, then, like a fleet-

"So the heave Knivah is going to release ther tonight, ch?" meeted one of the guards. "Won't Lyceon he happy to hear that! Hast ever been held over red-hot stones —felt the hair burn off first—them the skin stale and turn even! Hashot."

Kenar clung to the bars and a great disciness seized him They had sweeheard, by some trick, all that Melos and he had said: Now indeed his fate was dark. As the funtateps of the guards diminished down the gloomy tunnel, a horrible throught assailed Konaro-was Melos a app of Leaves, after all?

The next bours were the worst Konar had ever spent. With his head whirling, he stambled scross his smell cell, and not for from the opposite wall tripped and sprawled on the flore. His toe had rought in semething that rattled with a ghastle sound. He reached out and touched—bones! Shuddering, he felt along the skeleton arm, his fingers at last touching a cold from hand attached to a chain. Some poor soul had died here, Well, this might well he his fate! But not it would be worse than this!

He got to his feet and squared to absorblers He was Koner; the see of Petral, was he see! He was a Maredonian! He would die like a man, if the gods decreed. Like his own father would die aben his time rame!

But with this resolution, came another thought: He would not die? He would win out yet, save his father, rake him back to Mecchania, in the green hills and the beloved city of his high- ...

A sound startled him. It was a dull thinbbing. It seemed to come from under his cell. He put his rarto the rold stories. Thad Thud. He rould feel the stories silvate.

Jay such so be had never known surged through Konar Rescue! Knivah End come. He was digging under his cell. Apollo be praised! Apollo, god of the Sim, had not turned away....

A half hour passed. The thudding grew nearer, element in the floor. Keener sat there, praying that some passing guard would not hear. Once one clanked along the curridor and passed to peer inside the cell. He granted and passed on And Konse gave fewent thought chat the thudding had miraculously reased until the guard had disappeared.

Suddenly he felt the stone under him tremble, lift a fraction of an inch. He slid off it, breathless with excitement. It lifted further, and he could see a creek of light,

"Hist Konsel" came the ablant whisper. Konse spacered guardedly. "Then give a hand to this slak. We'll have then out of there . . . Heave!"

"Quirl! Down with thee!"

Koner had hardly por his feet into the hale when there was a secretar length from the cell door. Then a sharp command rung out. Instantly a resk of feet pounded along the outer narridge.

Red Brand gave Konar a great share and almost trampled upon him as he plunged into the sighness of the subterraneau hale, and les the stone fall back.

"Make heate, friend?" cried Kalnak. "They'll turn the waters on us and se'll drown like vata?"

Keener was making beste, such as the narrowness of the tunnel permitted. Red Board pushed against him from behind. Suddenly the hig man gasped and Keener heard a sound that from his blood. Water! A toreset of it rushing into the tunnel behind them! It reared upon them, spinished around their askales, rose to their hips with slarning rapidity.

"We're decimed unless we get not all here quickly! Breaths not, friend for the water is poissonics."

The lethal water had reached above their thighs. It impeded their progress Konas's head swam. Dark specks abot before his eyes. His fungs were hursting. A great rearing was in his head. He felt himself felling—falling.

A hurning thirst was Konne's first sensation when he came out of the death-like stupoe that had neveryme him in the tunnel. A horning thirst and a load einging is his ears. The ringing gradually faded, life opened his eyes. Buck rafters here above him, and nearby a wall of rushes, like that of a punc herder's but. On the wall above his con, ratching the guttering plan of a randle, he would see shields and implements of war. He turned his board.
